Marine Le Pen has never been closer to seizing power in France than she is now.

Despite having kept a somewhat low profile in recent months, the leader of the far-right National Rally has reason to be confident. Early polls show her not only reaching a run-off round against President Emmanuel Macron in 2022, but winning a larger share of the vote than ever before.

The implication – worrying to Macrons allies – is that the tactical voting which has always worked to keep the Le Pens out of the highest office may no longer be enough.
