Few French MEPs can boast about splitting their time between several offices at the heart of the EU — and the seat of French power, the Élysée.

Stéphane Séjourné is one of them.

It is a privilege that has given Séjourné a direct line to an influential EU leader, French President Emmanuel Macron, a rarity for a relatively new MEP in Brussels. And it has boosted Séjournés profile, helping the one-time socialist rise unopposed to the top of the European Parliaments third-largest group, Renew Europe, a centrist, liberal bloc.
