Greece's migration minister said on Tuesday the European Union is poised to take stricter measures on migration in 2025, with a focus on expanded deportations, but would not adopt the hard-line methods used by the Trump administration.

Sending migrants back shackled on military planes is very different from using regular commercial flights, Nikos Panagiotopoulos told state-run ERT television. However, he also said that for Europeans: Migration has evolved from primarily a humanitarian issue to fundamentally a security matter.

On Thursday, EU migration and home affairs ministers will meet in the Polish capital, Warsaw, to examine more stringent efforts against migration, backed by the current Polish presidency of the bloc.
