Relations between Astana and Moscow have a decisive influence on many key processes across the Eurasian region, Kazakh President Kassym-Jomart Tokayev said on Tuesday, ahead of his state visit to Russia where the two sides plan to sign a declaration elevating their ties to a comprehensive strategic partnership and alliance.

In an article published in Rossiyskaya Gazeta, Tokayev said Kazakhstan and Russia have managed to build a meaningful strategic partnership and alliance, and that their cooperation is based on eternal friendship and deep trust, respect, and equality.

He said the declaration to be signed in Moscow will usher in a new era in bilateral relations, confirming an unprecedented level of mutual trust and shared commitment to closer cooperation in all areas.
