Australia is estimated to miss its 2030 climate target by a small margin while badly missing its 2035 target if no significant changes are made, Climate Change Minister Chris Bowen said Thursday.

During his annual climate statement to parliament, Bowen said it was normal "for there to be a gap between projected emissions and a target 10 years in the future," according to the Australian Broadcasting Corporation.

"As new policies are developed and implemented, the emissions outlook improves. That's what a target is for -- to drive new initiatives and work," Bowen added.
