A PUSH FOR ECUMENISM IN THE CONTEXT OF A SPIRITUAL JOURNEY

While ecumenism in the context of Christianity as a whole denotes a positive development that transcends politics, the insistence on using the ecumenic title in the context of the Fener Greek Patriarchate denotes a negative development that represents the Patriarchates reckless ambition to transform itself into the Vatican of Eastern Orthodoxy.

The visit by Pope Leo XIV, the spiritual leader of the Roman Catholic Church and head of state of the Vatican, to Türkiye in November 2025 was carried out and concluded in a positive atmosphere, and subsequently receded from global headlines as various geopolitical developments played out around the world at the end of the year 2025 and 2026 that we have just entered. The Pope, as is customary from a head of state visiting Türkiye, first met with Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan and other high ranking Turkish officials. He subsequently met with various religious leaders of Türkiyes Christian communities[1] within the context of the main purpose of his visit, which was to commemorate the 1700th anniversary of the First Council of Nicaea (modern day İznik district of the city of Bursa in Türkiye).[2]

The First Council of Nicaea holds a critically important place in Christianity, as 1700 years ago, Christians leaders of the time came together under the auspices of the Byzantine (Eastern Roman) Emperor Constantine I to discuss and come to an agreement on conflicting Christian teachings. The resulting [Nicene Creed] became a foundational statement of Christian orthodoxy, shaping the theology of mainstream Christianity for centuries.[3] It is for this reason that the First Council of Nicaea is considered an ecumenical event in Christian history, meaning an event that promoted solidarity and unity amongst Christians.[4]

Ecumenism has been a consistent trend in the Christian world that stretches back for decades. Pope Francis, Leo XIVs predecessor, was a firm believer in ecumenism, and [saw] a fractured Christianity that is unable to cope with the challenges and ills of todays world, and thus desperately [sought] ways to bring together the Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant Christians of the world, preferably under the moral leadership of the Roman Catholic Church.[5] Pope Leo XIV seems intent on carrying on Francis legacy in this regard, as ecumenism was the central theme in all of his gatherings with Christian leaders during his visit in Türkiye. For example, during the prayer service organized in İznik near the archaeological excavation of the Basilica of St. Neophytus, where historians believe First Council of Nicaea took place, Leo XIV stated:

This Christological confession of faith is of fundamental importance in the journey that Christians are making towards full communion. [*] in the ecumenical context we can also say that, although we Christians are many, in the one Christ we are one. Consequently, with an awareness that we are already linked by such a profound bond, we can continue our journey of ever deeper adherence to the Word of God revealed in Jesus Christ, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in mutual love and dialogue. In this way, we are all invited to overcome the scandal of the divisions that unfortunately still exist and to nurture the desire for unity for which the Lord Jesus prayed and gave his life [...]

"Today, the whole of humanity afflicted by violence and conflict is crying out for reconciliation. The desire for full communion among all believers in Jesus Christ is always accompanied by the search for fraternity among all human beings. In the Nicene Creed, we profess our faith in one God, the Father. [...][6]

It is perfectly normal and indeed commendable for Christians around the world to spend the effort to reconcile their denominational differences. The problem arises when the quest for ecumenism intersects with politics and results in the violation of the sovereign rights of a state. This is clearly evidenced in the Joint Declaration signed by Pope Leo XIV and Patriarch Bartholomew, head of the Fener Greek Patriarchate of Istanbul, on 29 November 2025 during Leo XIV's visit to Türkiye. Although the Joint Declaration is primarily religious in content, it explicitly refers to Patriarch Bartholomew as the Ecumenical Patriarch and his church as the Ecumenical Patriarchate, a categorization that both Turkish officials and scholars have firmly rejected on countless occasions on the grounds that it violates the letter and spirit of the 1923 Lausanne Peace Treaty, the founding document of the Republic of Türkiye. According to the said treaty, the Fener Greek Patriarchate is tasked with serving the religious needs of the Orthodox Greek (Rum in Turkish) citizens of Türkiye and is required to abstain from all political activities both at home and abroad.[7]

While ecumenism in the context of Christianity as a whole denotes a positive development that transcends politics, the insistence on using the ecumenic title in the context of the Fener Greek Patriarchate denotes a negative development that represents the Patriarchate's reckless ambition to transform itself into the Vatican of Eastern Orthodoxy, which entails a state within a state in Türkiye, and which would consequently violate the Lausanne Treaty and Türkiye's state sovereignty. Since the Patriarchate is steeped in a belligerent form of Greek nationalism and has served as a conduit for attempts at foreign meddling in the past, the Turkish state tolerates the presence of the Patriarchate purely out of respect for its Orthodox Greek citizens and out of international political considerations.[8] With each passing year, Patriarch Bartholomew unfortunately insists on further alienating himself and his church from the Turkish state and public, all for the sake of gaining recognition for the ecumenic claim.

It is inconceivable that Pope Leo XIV, head of state of the Vatican known for carrying out carefully considered foreign policies, would not have known about Türkiye's sensitivities on this issue. Therefore, Pope Leo XIV knew about Turkish sensitivities, but chose to disregard them for the sake of pleasing Patriarch Bartholomew and pulling the Fener Greek Patriarchate closer to the Roman Catholic Church.
