The Caucasus Muslims Office, which is responsible for overseeing Azerbaijan's religious affairs, has recently decided to reconstitute the Erivan Gaziliği, the representative office/council of elders that historically oversaw the area that is now a part of Yerevan. However, this decision has sparked new disputes between Armenia and Azerbaijan. On 22 May 2025, the Caucasus Muslims Office publicly announced its decision to restore activities of the Erivan Gaziliği and published the bylaws of this representative office. In his speech, the Chairman of the Caucasus Muslims Office, Allahshukur Pashazade, stated that, just as there are similar religious centers in cities like Tbilisi, Batumi, and Derbent, the presence of such a center in Western Azerbaijan is a historical necessity [1] that reflects respect for the past and faith in the future. It should be noted that Western Azerbaijan is a contentious term in Azerbaijan-Armenia relations, and is used by Azerbaijan to signify that Azerbaijanis were systematically expelled by Armenians from their historical lands that are now a part of modern-day Armenia.

Before proceeding with our discussion, it is useful to briefly introduce the Caucasus Muslims Office. This institution was established in the 19th century by the Tsarist Russian administration. A Sheikh ul-Islam position was created to represent Shia Muslims, while a mufti office was established for Sunni Muslims. During the early years of the Soviet Union, all religious institutions were shut down as part of the state's atheist policies. However, during World War II, the Soviet government reconsidered its religious policies and reestablished the Caucasus Muslims Office in 1943. After Azerbaijan gained its independence, the office continued its activities, overseeing mosques, religious communities, and religious educational institutions that fall under its jurisdiction. The office is represented in different regions through councils of elders (gaziler şurası), which manage religious affairs at the local level and are led by religiously trained representatives/elders [2].

Turning to the current development, the Chairman of the Caucasus Muslims Office

Pashazadeh stated that Armenians destroyed in the past approximately 300 mosques and over 500 cemeteries in Western Azerbaijan, which constituted a clear violation of human rights and international law. In his speech, he emphasized that the establishment of the Erivan (Yerevan) Council of Elders will serve the purpose of enabling Azerbaijanis, who were forcibly displaced from Armenia, to return to their historical lands. He also stressed that the Blue Mosque (Göy Mescid), the only mosque that not destroyed by Armenians, should be reopened for use, and that Azerbaijanis must be allowed to freely access and use the mosque and other historical monuments in Western Azerbaijan[3].

Pashazadehs statements quickly spread through the Armenian press, which implored the Armenian Apostolic Church to issue a response. The Armenian Apostolic Church characterized Paşazades accusations [1][2] that Armenian religious centers are being used to promote the pathological Armenian dream of a Greater Armenia through false allegations and to appropriate the cultural and spiritual heritage of peoples by deceit [3] a series of irrational claims[4]. The Church argued that these remarks targeted the Armenian people and the Armenian Church with hatred and hostility, and amounted to spreading the falsehoods of Azerbaijani propaganda[5].

The Armenian Apostolic Church strongly reacted to Paşazades claim that Etchmiadzin is located on historical Azerbaijani lands, arguing that the ethnonym Azerbaijani emerged as a result of Soviet nation-building policies in the late 1930s and that it is absurd for a member of such a people to question the historical existence of the Armenian people, who have thousands of years of creative life and a universally recognized spiritual and cultural heritage[6]. However, the Church must surely know that Azerbaijani identity is not confined to the 20th century, but is based on much older historical and cultural foundations.

The Armenian Apostolic Church was not satisfied with this statement alone; and in an unsurprising move, sought to rally the Christian world behind it by declaring that Armenians are being victimized in the Karabakh issue and being subjected to Muslim oppression. Specifically, on May 27 [1] in Bern, Switzerland, in cooperation with the World Council of Churches and the Swiss Protestant Church, the Armenian Heritage Conference was organized that addressed the protection of Armenian religious and cultural heritage, the human rights of its people, and the future security of the Armenian nation[7].

Pastor Rita Famos, President of the Swiss Protestant Church, who emphasized Switzerland's reputation based on its tradition of neutrality and its aid mission, interestingly only mentioned the sufferings of the Armenian and Kurdish peoples during the meeting. Catholicos Karekin II, spiritual leader of the Catholicosate of Etchmiadzin, claimed that a cultural genocide similar to those that happened in Iran, Syria, and Afghanistan was taking place in Karabakh. It is baffling that those who advocated for Armenian rights in Switzerland ignored the Azerbaijani architectural monuments, cemeteries, houses, mosques, and other cultural heritage elements that have been destroyed over decades in Karabakh.

In conclusion, at a time when efforts to ensure stability and prosperity in the region are intensifying, the re-establishment of the Erivan Council of Elders by the Caucasus Muslim

Board, the appointment of an elder to this post, and the demand for Azerbaijanis to have the right to visit historical sites in Erivan (modern day Yerevan) can be seen as a reflection of the Azerbaijani people's desire to reclaim and preserve their historical heritage [1] the war having ended and the Karabakh territories having been regained by Azerbaijan. This situation also signifies the expression, through the leader of a religious institution, of the dreams of a people who were forcibly displaced from Western Azerbaijan in the 1980s to return to and revisit the lands where they were born.

On the other hand, the Karabakh region is one of the most sensitive issues for the Azerbaijani people. In this context, the decision to open an Azerbaijani religious representation in Erivan and a religious leaders emphasis on past Armenian attempts to destroy Azerbaijan's historical heritage can also be interpreted as a response [2] even a form of retaliation [3] what Armenia has done over the years. Following the victory in Karabakh, Azerbaijan's consolidation of sovereignty in the region, despite the Armenian side's continued expansionist and irredentist tendencies, may have provided the basis and confidence for making such statements.
